Workload: 02 theory periods per week and 01 practical per week.

SCOPE

The propagation of plants is one of the fundamental occupations of growing plants by human beings since time immemorial. Civilization might have started when ancient man learnt to plant and grow different kinds of plants, which fulfilled nutritional and other allied needs of human beings and their animals. Our cultivated plants originated mainly by direct selection from wild species (e.g. lima bean, tomato, barley and rice), hybridization between species, accompanied by changes in chromosome number (e.g. maize, wheat, pear, strawberry and prunes) and group of plants occur naturally as rare monstrosities (e.g. cabbage and broccoli). This progress in plant improvement would have been of little significance, without methods whereby improved forms could have been maintained in cultivation. Most cultivated plants either would have lost or reverted to less desirable forms unless they are propagated under controlled conditions that perceive the unique characteristic which make them useful. The ever increasing demand of fruit plants necessitates the need for improved propagation techniques. Tree breeding and propagation techniques serve as an important tool in fruit crops improvement programme. Fruit plants do not come true, when raised from seeds and therefore, these plants are generally raised through vegetative methods of propagation, either on their own roots by cutting or layering techniques or on the roots of other plants (rootstocks) by budding,
